

Attention! These instructions are not suitable for individuals who feel they need therapy to process their deepest emotions and traumas.

Note: This technique always yields results. If you do not reach the very end of the technique, that is simply the level you achieved this time; you will get further in future attempts. If you fail to make progress, you have created an excuse to intentionally sabotage the process. Do not lie to yourself—you don't need to act tough when no one is watching. If any part remains unclear, there are thoughts at the end that may help, but if they don't, please contact Kipnuni(Artur).

Kipnuni Technique

This technique can be used to reprogram the brain by changing the subconscious level. Normally permanent change happens in weeks or months but with this technique, it can be made in just minutes to a few hours.

One of the best use cases for this is to remove any anxiety, but the creator (Kipnuni) is also actively using it to develop himself to better reach his goals (world peace).

1 Preparation

1.1 The Change

In short: Choose what to change in your mind

The first change should be as simple and easy as possible. If you cannot use the technique for a simple change, it probably won't work with anything more complex.

If you are able to use this technique once, you're able to use it as many times again as you want.

1.2 Peaceful space

In short: Be still, in a space with minimal distractions

Face your mind and emotions preferably without any distractions (being alone with one's own mind is one of the hardest things for a human). It can work with music, but it weakens the impact and efficiency—so if it's not working, try it without.

1.3 Relaxation

In short: Remember to relax your body

The goal is not to bash your head against a wall or force anything, stay in a comfortable, relaxed position. Every so often, while processing your emotions, remember to relax again. Difficult topics automatically activate muscles because anxiety is a protective instinct. If you are too physically tense, you give your mind a reason to quit because "this activity is physically exhausting, so it must not be good."

2 Facing the Mind

2.1 The Big Wave

In short: Face all the emotions and thoughts as one, then start focusing on your problem

When a wave of thoughts and emotions hit, the goal is not to "process" them individually, but simply to stand against them without letting them shake you. Face all thoughts and emotions as one big wave rather than separately. This makes it easier. If you cannot receive the wave, that's okay. Take a deep breath and try again when you can.

When you notice the waves are no longer as intense, choose one thing you want to develop.

2.2 The Anxiety Monster

In short: Face the problem head on

The Anxiety Monster is the problem that causes anxiety just by thinking about it, making you want to avoid it.

Most people have experienced that they avoided work or school work because it caused some form of anxiety or it felt difficult. But when they actually managed to start doing it, the feeling was surprisingly pleasant and even fun.

The same can apply to facing difficult feelings. You might be used to thinking that facing them should feel difficult, but just test whether you can find it at all interesting and even fun. It's a sort of puzzle work after all.

2.3 Little Devils

In short: Your brain is against change and don't get excited

In the fifth Harry Potter book, Thestrals are introduced—creatures only those who have seen death can see. Anxiety is surrounded by similar entities that remain hidden until you accidentally bump into them or hear about them (which is happening now). After this, you cannot help but notice them.

When you face anxiety, all sorts of thoughts enter your mind (these are the devils):

- "Suddenly I feel like eating something."
- "I want to start that challenging project I've been thinking about."
- "This technique probably won't even work."
- "I suddenly feel so tired; this is exhausting."
- "I feel like I've done enough for this time."

The worst thought of all is: "I suddenly felt the inspiration/excitement to face this thing I was avoiding, so I don't need to continue this process. Thanks, it worked."

These thoughts and feelings—especially the last one—are clever devils. They are trying to pull you away from facing the feeling and making a permanent, important change in your mind. It's in the biology that the brain doesn't want to change if not necessary. The good news is that these devils are actually cowards; once you see them, they give up surprisingly easily and run away.

The last devil example also gives another requirement for the technique to work: don't get excited about the topic! If you do anyways, try to relax and get rid of the excitement. This might seem odd advice, but what you want to replace is your brain when you're not excited and have a lot of energy. Otherwise you'd be continuing the same way than everyone else and require excitement to manage the topic you wanted to change.

Eventually you will lose to the devils and stop the process. It's okay if that happens before finishing the change and even early on on the process. What's important is trying to live relaxed in your normal life and only if you feel like it come back to this technique. Just remember that you can't use an argument again for yourself that there is no fix to your problems. Now there is.

3 The Actual Process 😊

Note: I would recommend to first read this full chapter 3 before trying out the technique. It might not work perfectly with a follow along method.

3.1 A New Emotional State

In short: Create a good alternative to the problem

How many times have you tried to remove an anxious feeling just by focusing on it? Has it worked well? The brain is ultimately a collection of simple connections; if you only focus on the problem, you strengthen the problem.

Because of this, you must create a new emotion or scenario for the problem. What are you trying to change the feeling into? For example, if the word "email" or the situation "giving a speech" causes anxiety, the new feeling is: "Thinking about the word 'email' brings a neutral or positive feeling" and "I enjoy giving speeches."

It's a common advice that you should define your goals better, this is the same.

Imagine a village and a road that leads there. This is in the brain. The village causes anxiety and the road is a brain connection. You can't just block the road, because people will be using the road anyways and go around the blockage to the village. The people need to go somewhere. What you can do is to create another village, a good one and then build a connecting road to the main one and then direct the people to this new village.

3.2 The Message

In short: Create a positive message to the alternative

Create a direct message from the new change, such as "I like sending emails" or "I like giving speeches."

Try to form a "positive" message towards the alternative and not negative. It's easier for the subconscious to understand how it should react. So no double negatives (The problem: giving speeches. The bad message: "I don't fear giving speeches". The good message: "I like giving speeches.")

3.3 The Subconscious Disagreement

When you say this message, it should feel "wrong" and trigger the problem-feeling that says, "That's not true." This is the subconscious feeling you want to replace.

- test the response with something else

"I love ice cream", "I hate ice cream" (everyone else is eating ice cream and you are offered one. Do you say to them "I hate ice cream" and not get one?)

- You can gaslight your "feeling" to be negative

- Think of the subconscious response as a sign

- Your brain gives it's opinion about things long before you would even focus on the topic and most of the time you just use this opinion and don't do your own research

If you don't feel a negative emotion when you say the message, it's because you only said it consciously without giving space for the feelings. Relax again and repeat it while being as aware as possible of what you said, without straining. Sometimes (especially when tired), you may have to repeat the message more than 10 times to recognize the feeling.

If you can't tell if the answer is "Yes" or "No," try to imagine a situation where you are performing the anxious act. If thinking about it produces no anxiety, do you even have a problem? Concreteness is a good way to bring the feeling back; sometimes when you "enter" the feeling, it suddenly disappears (e.g., starting work is hard, but once you start, it's easy).

3.4 Processing the Emotions

- personal logic

- gaslighting the brain

- optimization

Once you've said the message and it triggers anxiety, the analysis and dialogue with the subconscious begins. "Hey subconscious, why don't you like it when I think about this topic?" Since none of us are crazy (hopefully), we won't get a clear, verbal answer. It is easiest to get a Yes/No response from the subconscious, meaning it either agrees or disagrees with the message.

One argument the subconscious always uses is: "This topic makes me anxious because I am used to it making me anxious..." What is that? You are anxious because you are anxious? Yes, exactly. The brain is lazy and reinforces everything—be it good or bad—but especially the bad. Well, does it make any sense to be anxious just because you're used to it? No, that is not a reason.

At this stage, say the message again and try to bring the feeling up. Then pressure the subconscious to answer why you should listen to its argument. You might not notice the change immediately, but the subconscious cannot argue against this logic, and you may start to notice the amount of anxiety is just a tiny bit smaller.

Questions you can ask the subconscious:

- Why are you causing this feeling?

- Where did this feeling come from? Help me understand and recall situations where I have felt it. (Often involving some kind of trauma).
- Is it a specific part of the activity, or can the task be broken into smaller pieces? If so, which specific part causes the anxiety?

3.5 Measuring the Change

How to measure the amount of anxiety and why is it important? The goal is not just to face the situation once, but to fix the problem permanently. When you say the message, listen to the subconscious response: is it a "No" or a "Yes"—does it agree or not? Because the message is toward a new, positive situation, you can bet the subconscious will say "No." The goal is to change it so the answer becomes "Yes."

Even if you get a "No," it isn't 100% "No"—it might be 90% "No" and 10% "Yes." When you argue with the subconscious and corner it, the "Yes" percentage grows and the "No" decreases. The goal is to get the "Yes" feeling to cross the 50% threshold and, like in an election, win. This small percentage shift can be felt as a physical sensation of insight in the brain.

Whenever your thoughts drift into a tangent, bring them back by saying the message again and analyzing the feeling. Imagine the subconscious as "dumb matter." You aren't trying to win perfectly with logic; you are just trying to get it to answer "Yes." That is your only goal. This "Yes" means that the next time you encounter the topic outside of this session, your mind will automatically use the feeling you have built. If you succeeded in changing the feeling, you will use the new, good feeling without having to exert any effort.

The process can take several hours, and some arguments/reasons from the subconscious might lead you to another problem that you must change first before you can change the original one. The error, however, is stopping before you have reached the 50% point. How do you know for sure you've reached it? Because you have never experienced a similar state in your life and you doubt it. When you try to switch back from the new state to the old anxious state and you cannot do it, you have reached the new state. If you don't feel a big change but believe you've already achieved it... congratulations, you've found a new "devil."

(you can't recreate the bad arguments)

4 Toward Dreams

Once you grasp the process of removing anxiety or shifting your motivation, you have a tool to change your life. Humans are extremely flexible. Often, anxiety is caused by our inability to adapt to the real world. We would like to live in a world built by our own minds, but this isn't a fantasy world. Even though we no longer live on the savannah like 60,000 years ago, we can still find a happy life that fulfills our personal needs and desires.

5 Additional Thoughts That May Help

5.1 Too Vague

If the topic causing anxiety is too vague, this process will not work. You must clarify the problem first. This can be done by thinking through concrete actions. If the question is "What do I want from life?", it might lead to "I don't know because I don't know who I am," which leads to deeper questions about reality. The world is full of answers to life's philosophy; there is no single right answer, so one option is to just start with something you already like doing. What matters is that you clarify things for yourself. The more specific the answer, the better.

5.2 Relax and Feel

Many people imagine that control over life requires effort, but that isn't true. If you want to do something challenging, the wrong way is to "try" during the act. The better way is to do it as relaxed as possible and rather fail immediately than struggle and fail later. When you allow yourself to live in a more sensitive state, you notice anxious feelings more easily. You can then process these feelings using the method above after the failure. If you strain at everything, you confuse your mind about what you can and cannot do. Your true goal is to perform tasks relaxed, not through sheer force.

5.3 Can I break myself with this?

If you're worried this process is unnatural, consider: what is a "natural" change? Seeing advertisements that glue hidden messages in your head? Traumas from childhood? This process simply means you are thinking for yourself and making the changes you want. Since all changes are your own doing, you can try to change them back (good luck). You are moving toward an adaptation to reality that fits your deepest essence.

5.4 I can't recognize the subconscious answers

5.5 The process is a puzzle

The initial feeling of the process is likely difficult, but once you get into it, it can become much easier. At that point, see if your mind can accept the process as a fun puzzle. A lot of things come down to attitude, and this is one of them.

Final Words These instructions are an incomplete writing based on one person's experiences. Because it deals with the mind and deep topics, it is impossible to explain everything understandably to everyone. If this guide did not work for you, but you would like it to, contact the creator, Artur :D.
